Description:

While the evidence for empathy education as an enabler for youth civic engagement is gaining momentum, the mechanisms for this connection are less known. Using an intersectionality theoretical framework, the connections and opportunities for youth across formal (school) and non-formal (community) education systems, through methodologies including youth as researchers/peer learning, arts, sport and literature as components of empathy education are explored. These methods are then woven to known frameworks for youth civic engagement including political and social justice participatory models. Finally, an emergent connection between affective empathy in youth and social support enlistment will be highlighted.
